What They'll Need to Know

A 30-page family logistics guide. One place for the information your family may someday need.

THE PROBLEM

When the time comes, how will your family know where everything is?

When a parent dies or can no longer speak for themselves, the family is suddenly in charge of everything. The one person who knew where it all was can't tell them anymore. So they search through drawers, guess at passwords, and argue about what Mom or Dad would have wanted, in the middle of the hardest weeks of their lives.

Which accounts exist?

A savings account nobody knew about. A life insurance policy. A subscription still charging a card every month. Without a list, you find out by accident, if you find out at all.

Who should we call?

The doctor, the attorney, the insurance agent, the people who should hear it from family first. You're making calls in the worst week of your life without knowing who is on the list.

Where are the important documents?

You know there's a will, a deed, a power of attorney. You just don't know which drawer, which box, or which bank. So you keep looking.

What would they have wanted?

Their care, their service, their final wishes. When nothing is written down, the family is left guessing, and sometimes fighting.

Your family deserves certainty, not guesswork. One conversation today and one organized guide mean they will know exactly where to look, who to call, and what you wanted.

DOES THIS SOUND LIKE YOU?

If any of these thoughts are familiar,
this guide was made for you.

"Mom is 78 and I have no idea who her doctor is anymore."

You'd be the one getting the call from the hospital. Right now, you'd be starting from zero.

"Dad always said everything is in the filing cabinet."

Which folder? Which bank? Which insurance policy? "Somewhere" isn't an answer at 2 a.m. in an ER waiting room.

"Every time I bring it up, she changes the subject."

You know you need to ask. You just don't know how to start without it feeling morbid.

"My brother and I would argue about what Dad wanted."

When nothing is written down, families end up guessing, and guessing turns into fighting.

If you only do five things, do these. Fifteen minutes, and the most useful information is already captured.

- Emergency contacts & medications
Fill out the one-page Emergency Summary (Section 1). It's meant to stand alone.
- Where the will and key legal documents are Just the location, in Section 6. Not what they say, just where to find them.
- Where financial information lives
Which institutions, in Section 7. Not balances, just where the details are kept.
- Who to call, and in what order
A short list in Section 4, even if it's only two or three names for now.
- Tell one person this guide exists
In Before You Begin. A completed guide only helps if someone knows to look for it.

Everything else in this guide builds on these five things. There's no rush to finish the rest in one sitting.

Helping a Parent Fill This Out?

Starting the conversation can be harder than filling out the guide itself. Start small, offer to fill out your own copy alongside theirs, and don't try to finish everything at once.

The Complete Family Bundle includes Starting the Conversation: a short companion guide with example scripts, common objections, and a first-conversation worksheet.

Emergency Summary

One page with contacts, doctor, pharmacy, medications, and allergies.

Financial Accounts

7 - Financial Accounts & Insurance

For security, note only the last 4 digits of account numbers, and where full details are stored.

Assets

Include everything: everyday and savings accounts, investment or brokerage accounts, and retirement savings (401(k), IRA, pension, etc.). No need to list balances, just that the account exists and where the details are kept.

Financial Accounts

Which institutions exist and where details are kept. No balances or account numbers.

Complete on its own. Twelve sections, an emergency summary, and an updates log. It's designed to keep sensitive details out: it records where passwords and account numbers are kept, not the numbers themselves.

BEFORE YOU DECIDE...

The guide helps you organize the answers. But how do you get those answers in the first place?

If you have an aging parent, this is a conversation you need to have with them, and the right time is now, while they can still tell you.

But it isn't always an easy conversation. Your parent may avoid the subject or wonder why you're asking. And even once everything is organized, will your family know what to do first when an emergency happens?

That's why there's a more complete way to prepare.

The Complete Family Bundle

Start the conversation. Organize the information.
Know what to do next.

Three practical PDF guides, plus printable labels to help you organize the actual paper documents.

Three guides, each built for a different hard moment.
